

Healthy Portfolios, Healthy Environment: How to make your money matter

Toxic chemicals from everyday products contaminate the bodies of every person in this country. Shower curtains, water bottles, baby bottles, toys, shampoo, cosmetics, computers, and hundreds of other common products that people use every day contain toxic chemical ingredients that leach out of the products and into our bodies.

In San Diego over 150 million pounds of toxic waste are generated each year by San Diego industries and over 3 million pounds of toxic pollutants are discharged annually into the air.

In this workshop you will learn:

- How you can invest in and support green companies
- How toxic hazards can increase risks for investors and hinder share performance
- How non-toxic safe alternatives and “green chemistry” can benefit corporate bottom lines and reward investors’ portfolios
- How San Diegans can support local efforts to reduce toxins

Found in Americans of all ages were traces of 148 chemicals including lead, mercury, dioxins, and PCBs, according to a recent survey conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. These and related findings are contributing to rising awareness that the choices businesses make about managing toxic chemicals in their products not only impacts our health, but can have major financial consequences for the companies and their investors.
